COMMANDMENTS BY BRAVE AVIATOR

Man Who Uses His Head Is a Model to Follow.

HOW TO "GET MOST HUNS"

Fliers Find Help In Time of Trouble by Putting Themselves In Enemy's Place and Wondering How Frightened He, Too, Must Be—Mystery of the "Doo-Hickie" Still Unsolved.

Among the possessions of a British naval squadron cooperating with the "army that flies" along the front is a foolscap manuscript notebook bearing the superscription "Notes on Aerial Fighting." The youthful author of these notes will never handle pen again, but he has left behind him a document that is in its way one of the epics of war literature. It has since been printed (in expurgated form) and has doubtless found its way into textbooks and treatises on the subject. But to be appreciated to the full it should be read in the original round, rather boyish handwriting within hearing of the continuous murmur of the British guns and the drone of a scouting fighter passing overhead.

It contains ten commandments which, for a variety of reasons, need not be recapitulated here. But the introduction epitomizes the spirit of them all:

"The man who gets most Huns in his lifetime is the man who observes these commandments and fights with his head. The others either get killed or get nerves in a very short time and the country does not get the full benefit of having trained them."

The commandments conclude with the following exhortation: "A very pleasant and help in time of trouble is to put yourself in the enemy's place and view the situation from his point of view. If you feel full hearted before an attack just think how frightened he must be!"

A Frenchman Appears.

This fate [illegible] the Frenchman to the [illegible] the navy [illegible]. The [illegible] landed [illegible]. The [illegible] of the navy [illegible] young man, chubby and blue eyed. The squadron [illegible] to greet him with ready hospitality and hero worship.

"Hear you, N.," said the squadron commander. "How goes it?"

"Tolerable, I thank you," said the squadron commander.

"He says he's on sick leave," explained one of the hosts. "He's just flying to keep his eye in. He scuppered five bochs last week."

"Oui" said the Frenchman, nodding and held up his hand with outstretched fingers, "cinq!"

"Good on you, old sport!" said the squadron commander. They shook hands again, and the remainder clustered rather curiously around the shooter machine with the black skull and [illegible] adorning its fuselage.

"Makes one sort of sorry for the Hun, doesn't it?" said one aviator musingly.

"George," said another, "ask him what that doo hickie on the muzzle of his gun's for." He indicated a detail on the mounting.

The Frenchman explained at some length, and the interpreter interpreted.

"Bon!" said the squadron commander.

"Oui" said the Frenchman. "Tres bon! You 'ave not cet cette comment dites vous doo hickie? No?"

"No," was the reply. "Mais nous blooming well allons."

Definition of a "Doo Hickie."

The Frenchman promptly climbed back into his machine and took his departure. The squadron commander summoned his chief armorer and for awhile deep called to deep.

"He's a talbot lad, that Frenchman," said the squadron commander when the chief armorer had gone. "I fancy he only came down to let us see that doo hickie of his on his gun. You ought to hear him spin some of his yarns, though."

The stranger within the gates of the navy that flies gazed after the aerial speck against the blue of heaven, and his soul was glad within him because it was all the purest navy.

"That's all right," he said. "But what I should like to know is, What the deuce is a doo hickie?"

"A doo hickie?" replied the squadron commander. "A doo hickie? H-m-m! George, how would you describe a doo hickie?"

The officer appealed to puffed his pipe in silence for a moment.

"Well," he said at length, "you know more or less what a gadget's like?"

"Yes."

"And a gilguy?"

"Yes."

"Well, a doo hickie is something like that, only smaller, as a rule."

There was silence. Then the squadron commander leaned forward and flicked a speck of fluff off the shoulder of the stranger within their gates.

"There you are!" he exclaimed triumphantly, "that's a doo hickie!"

"Have a drink anyway," said the officer who answered to the name of George soothingly.

The stranger within the gates of the navy that flies had the drink and from that time onward forbore to ask any more questions. But he still sometimes wonders what are the functions of a doo hickie.
