The Coach Takes a Definite Place Among Motor Vehicles

"The coach and four were among the most picturesque modes of travel in the last century, but it is doubtful if the high wheeled vehicle of yesterday, drawn by its prancing steeds, ever approached the utility of the modern automobile coach and four cylinders," says J. Irving Goodspeed, local dealer in Durant and Star cars.

"The coach is a body type that has in recent years achieved popularity among motorists, and this year's indications point to an increased vogue for coach bodies. The coach is neither sedan nor coupe, yet it combines the advantages of both. It is well proportioned for five passengers and close coupled for coziness.

"The two door coach is especially popular. The doors are wider than on most cars and permit easy entrance to front or rear seats. The two front seats are usually individual but are not widely separated as in the former chummy models. One or both of them fold forward to permit access to rear seats.

"Another advantage of the two-door coach is that on either side of the car are only two windows, so that panes of plate glass are very broad and splendidly light the car's interior. The "blind spot," which means the points at which the driver's vision in a closed car is obstructed by window frames and partiaions, is reduced to an inconsiderable minimum.

"The public is apt to attribute expensiveness to new departures in design, but coach models as a rule are very reasonably priced They are quite nicely finished and as comfortable as other closed models.

"The coach lines are a pleasing combination of streamline in the lower body construction and straight lines in the upper part. Because of the close coupled construction there is room to include a luggage space at the rear of the car. Dark colors are the favorites for coach exterior finish, in keeping with the general apeparance of simplicity. Upholstery is in lighter shades.

"The Durant coach is among the new models that earned instant favor at the recent closed car shows in the larger cities. It follows conventional coach lines to some extent but in many respects sets new precedents of coach design and finish. The body is built on the Durant Four chassis and reflects the Durant standard of quality recognized in other Durant models.

"There have been from time to time fads for each of the various body types presented by manufacturers. Some of these become permanent features of each year's production, as have the touring car, roadster, sedan and coupe, and now the coach has received the public's endorsement to such an extent that it takes a definite place among standard motor vehicles.
