The Holy Father

'Christians Must Assist Developing Nations'

Value was placed on Pope Paul VI's emphasis on the need to assist the developing nations. The document, "De Aequo et Justo," also emphasized the importance of economic and social development, especially in the Third World. The Pope called for a new spirit of cooperation and solidarity among nations.

Without actually endorsing an economic system, the Pope did mention cooperation with economically advanced nations to aid in the growth of less developed nations. This was seen as the way of assuring justice to all people.

The Pope reminded the delegates that the Christian tradition exhorts us to share our blessings with the poor and to work for the common good. This is what the Charter of the United Nations stresses on the economic and social development of people, and the Pope added that it is necessary for nations to collaborate in order to achieve this goal.

Pope Reveals Papal House Reforms

Pope Paul VI has announced a series of reforms in the Papal Household. Among the reforms, the Pope has said that the Church must consider the needs of the laity, that is, the lay people, and that they should be given a greater role in the Church's life.

The Pope also emphasized the importance of the Church's mission to serve the world, and he called for a renewed spirit of charity and service.
