Crops hard hit by foul weather

By ELIZABETH SIMONOFF

After weeks of unseasonably cool and rainy weather, the vegetables should be top heavy and would have been pulled, had they not been damaged by the rain. Soggy fields were a common sight throughout the region.

For the price of the rain, the vegetable growers have suffered a significant loss. Tomatoes, cucumbers, peppers, and squash are some of the crops that have been affected. The damage is expected to cost farmers thousands of dollars.

In Yorktown, the-day before the rain, the local farmers were expecting a good harvest. However, after the rain, the fields were waterlogged, and the crops were damaged. The farmers are hoping for a better harvest next year.

The rain has also affected the local water supply. The Yorktown Water District has reported a decrease in water levels, and the district is urging residents to conserve water.

In conclusion, the recent rainy weather has caused significant damage to the local agricultural industry. The farmers are facing a challenging season, and the residents are urged to support local produce by buying local.
