EMIGRATION.

Those who desire to procure Certificates for Passage, for their friends or Drafts on the Royal or National Banks of Ireland, National Bank of Scotland, and the Bank of Messrs Glynn, Halifax Mills & Co, London, and Guion & Co., Liverpool will do well to remember that the

OLD EMIGRATION AND FOREIGN EXCHANGE OFFICE,
No. 5 Sidway Block, Commercial Street,
BUFFALO,

Is the Oldest and Best, having been established for TEN years during which time several thousands of dollars have passed in passage orders and drafts, safely through the hands of the undersigned, and been duly forwarded to the destination required, and duly paid on presentation to the Irish Bank, and have not to be sent to Liverpool to be paid, as others are.

To those who desire to have their friends brough to this country from any part of Europe, the subscriber would say, that he is the authorized Agent of that popular and unerring Line of Packet Ships called of Liverpool, a few of whose ships it will be sufficient to name,

The Washington,	The Robert Kelly,
The Guy Mannering,	The Niagara.
The D. W. Clinton,	The Marmion,
The J. A. Westervelt,	The Universe,
The Enterprise,	The Princeton,
The Ticonderoga,	The Shannon.

These magnificent ships are from 1,000 to 2,000 tons burthen, and fitted up with every comfort, commanded by experienced Captains, whose uniform kindness is lordly spoken of.

☞ Let it be distinctly understood, that the ships of the Black Star Line sail from Liverpool without fail, on their appointed days—1st, 6th, 11th, 16th, 21st and 26th of each month.

There is no delay caused to the emigrant, as the Passage Certificate is plainly for their Convenience alone

DRAFTS are instantly for sale on the following Banks:

The Royal Bank of Ireland and National Bank of Ireland.
National Bank of Scotland.
Banks of Messrs. Glynn, Halifax, Mills & Co. London, and Guion & Co, Liverpool.

The Evening Post.

The Two Friends; or The Fatal Misunderstanding.

At a small supper party to which I was invited at St. John's College, during my visit to Cambridge, a little story of College life in former times was related, which made a deep impresion upon me.

Two young men the narrator said, matriculated in the same year at one of the colleges I think it was at St. John's itself; but am not quite sure. The one was a somewhat fiery, passionate youth, of the name of Elliot; the other grave, and somewhat stern; but frank, and no way sullen. His name was Bailey. As so frequently happens with men of very dissimilar character, a great intimacy sprang up between them. They were sworn friends and companions; and during the long vacation of the second year, Bailey spent a great portion of his time at the house of Elliot's mother. In those days before liberal notions began to prevail, this was considered as an honor; for Bailey was a man of aristocratic birth, and Elliot a plebian. There was a great attraction in the house, however; for besides his mother, a sickly and infirm woman, Elliot's family comprised a sister, "the cynosure of neighboring eyes."

After their return to College in one of their drinking bouts, then but too common, a quarrel took place among a number of the College youths; the officers of the University interfered, and one of them received a dangerous blow from Bailey, which put his life in jeopardy. It was judged necessary to fly immediately, and at the entreaty of his friend, he sought an asylum, in the house of Elliot's mother. After the lapse of several days, the wounded officer was pronounced out of danger, and Elliot set out to inform his friend of the good tidings. Precaution, however, was still necessary, as the college officers were still in pursuit; and he went alone, and on horseback by night with pistols at his saddle bow, as was then customary. The distance he had to ride was some two and thirty miles and he arrived about midnight.

Like all young men of his temperament, Elliot was fond of dreaming dreams. He had remarked the admiration of his friend for his sister, to whom he was devotedly attached, and her evident love for him, and he had built up a little castle in the air in regard to their union, and her elevation to station and fortune. As he approached the house, no windows showed a light but those of his sister's room, and putting the horse in the stable himself, he took the pistols from the holsters, approached the house, and quietly opened the door. A great oak staircase, leading from the hall to the rooms above, was immediately within sight of the top landing, on the right of which lay his mother's chamber, and on the left that of his sister. The young man's first and natural impulse was to look up; but what was his surprise, indignation and horror, when he beheld the door of his sister's room quietly open and the figure of Bailey glide out upon the landing. For a moment there was a terrible struggle within him; but he restrained himself and in as calm a tone as he could assume, said, "Come down—I want to speak with you."

Without the slightest hesitation or embarrasment, Bailey came down, and followed him into an avenue of trees which led up to the house. The only question he asked was, "Is the man dead?"

"Come on, and I will tell you," answered the other; and when they had got some hundred yards from the house, he suddenly turned, and struck Bailey a violent blow on the face, exclaiming, "Villian and scoundrel! give me instant satisfaction for what you have done this night. There's a pistol. No words; for by——either you or I do not quit this ground alive!"

Bailey attempted to speak; but the other would not hear him, and struck him again with the butt end of the pistol. The young man's blood was aroused. He snatched the weapon from his hand, and retired a few paces into the full moonlight, Elliot gave the words, "One, two, three," and the pistols were fired almost at the same instant.

The next morning at an early hour, Mrs. Elliot, now very ill, said to her daughter, who had been watching by her bedside all night, "I wish my dear child, you would send some one to Mr. Bailey, to say I detire to speak with him. After what passed between us three the day before yesterday, I am sure he will willingly relieve a mother's anxiety, and let me see you united to him before I die. It must be very speedy, Emma; for my hours are drawing to a close, and I fear cannot even be protracted till your dear brother can be sent for.

Emma Elliot gazed at her mother for a moment with tearful eyes, and then answered as calmly as she could, "I can call him myself, mamma. He sleeps in my old room now, since the wind blew down the chimney of that he had formerly."

"No, send one of the servants," said her mother; and in a few minutes after, Mr. Bailey was in the room. He was a man of a kind heart, and generous feelings, and but the slightest shade of hesitation in the world was visible in the consent he gave to an immediate union with Emma Elliot; but both she and her mother remarked that he was deadly pale.

The laws of England were not so strict in those times as they are now in regard to marriage. The clergyman's house was not more than a stone's throw from their own dwelling, and the priest was instantly summoned and came

"It is strange," he said, "Mr. Bailey," just before the ceremony. "As I walked up the avenue, I saw a great pool of blood."

"Nothing else?" asked Mr. Bailey, with a strange and bewildered look.
