THE OLD ROOT DOCTOR.

DR. WETMORE,

Botanical Root or Indian Doctor.

WOULD inform his friends and the public in general, that he has removed from FAYETTE to the village of GENEVA, and has taken a house in Seneca-Street, next door East of the Geneva Museum, it being No. 5. in said street; where he will be happy to wait on those who stand in need of assistance in his line of practice.

As the multiplicity of calls from various parts of the country are so great, and people have so often been disappointed in not finding me at home, I have appointed three days in each week, that I shall calculate to be at home, namely, Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays, of each week, unless called away by a case of great emergency.

As my method of Practice has been tested in this section of the country for more than ten years past, I deem it useless to make any comments upon the same; but finding the difficulty of Collecting small debts from various parts of the country, I would inform the public, that in future, all Medicine to the amount of one dollar or less, must be paid for on delivery.

CIDER MAKING.

The manufacturing of apples into cider, is strictly speaking, a chemical process; and yet few who practice it, govern themselves in their operations by chemical principles. In making cider, the same care is necessary that would be required in making wine from grapes, where it is desirable to produce a fine article, as cider when well made, might with propriety be called a wine from apples, and with proper care may be made equally as palatable, and more conducive to health, than most of the wines retailed in the country at the present day.

In our first volume we gave directions for making cider; but as many of our present readers were not subscribers for that volume, we will repeat them, hoping that many may be induced to follow them, at least so far as to save themselves the mortification often manifested by indolent farmers, when proffering a glass of sour, musty cider to their neighbor, attempting at the same time to save their reputation by saying "their cider is rather hard, as the cask is almost out," when, in fact, it had the same disagreeable flavor when the cask was first broached.

In the first place, we take it for granted that most of the northern states produce apples which are capable of being manufactured into the finest quality of cider. We would not be understood, when speaking of fine cider, as preferring it according to the quanity of alcohol contained in it, but, on the contrary, we think that most desirable which has the least, provided there is sufficient to make it generous, and prevent its running into the acetous fermentation. The produce of every orchard in Western New-York is sufficiently rich, when properly prepared, to insure it against this evil, without any addition of saccharine matter, or increasing its strength by reducing its quantity, by boiling, freezing, or any other process whatever.

One very important thing to be remembered by farmers is, that good cider cannot be drawn from foul casks. Unless casks are carefully cleansed as soon as the cider is drawn from them, or made so perfectly tight that they cannot dry or become musty, it is almost impossible to cleanse them so as to be fit to use a second time, without injuring their contents.

The most effectual way of cleansing casks that have through neglect become foul, is by taking out one head, when they may be scoured and scalded as occasion may require.

Having clean casks in which to put cider when made, care should be taken that all the utensils used in the making should be clean, and destitute of any disagreeable taste or smell.

Much has been said as to particular varieties of apples for making fine cider, from which many have drawn the conclusion, that it was impossible to make fine cider from common apples, as produced by most of the orchards: this is a mistake.—With proper care, a liquor may be made from the apples as collected from orchards, whether grafted or not, equal in flavor to much that is sold as wine, by our second rate dealers, and at the same time more conducive to health, being destitute of many noxious articles made use of by our wine dealers and wine manufacturers.

We know it is a common thing with some farmers, when gathering apples, to pick up all such as are what they call "red rotten," which they say do not injure the flavor of the cider; but this should not be allowed; all apples which are unsound should be rejected; neither should any leaves be allowed to enter the mill with the apples.

Different opinions prevail with regard to the construction of the mill for preparing the apples; but a mill of almost any construction will answer the purpose if in repair, although some are more convenient than others, and are capable of making a greater quantity from the same apples than others; but in whatever mill the apples are ground, they should be so bruised as entirely to change the color.

After the apples are ground they should, if circumstances will permit, be allowed to remain in the vat from twelve to twenty-four hours, during which time the pomace should be frequently stirred, that the color may be more uniform. After the cider runs from the press, it is mostly put into barrels and carried into the cellar for fermentation. Some prefer large tubs or casks for fermenting in, others allow the cider to remain in the casks in which it was brought from the mill. This matter should be decided upon before the cider is put into the casks, and the operation conducted accordingly. If the fermentation is to be in tubs, it is not so important that it should be finely strained, as whatever of the pomace remained in the liquor, would be brought to the top in the form of scum, and in all cases the clear liquor should be drawn off before this descends to the bottom. If, on the contrary, the cider is to remain in the barrels to ferment, too much pains cannot be taken in straining, to prevent the pomace from entering the barrel, as it would rise to the top, and much of it adhere to the top of the barrel, and must either descend through the cider or remain upon the staves, giving a bad flavor to the contents of the cask.—When cider is to remain in the cask, it should be strained through flannel, the same as when drawn from the tubs. After the first of the fermentation is over, the bung hole should be covered with a cloth, on which should be placed a weight to keep the air from entering, while it allowed the gas from within to escape.

When cider is to be racked twice, the first should take place as soon as the fermentation has subsided; but when it is not intended to be racked but once, it may remain until the liquor has become quite still. After the last racking, about two quarts of skim milk should be added to each barrel, and well incorporated, after which the cask should be bunged perfectly tight. Those who prefer sweet cider, should check the fermentation by fining with milk before all the saccharine matter is destroyed; but those who prefer a dry liquor, should leave more time for the fermentation.

A most pernicious practice prevails with some farmers, of putting into the barrels at the mill straw bungs, and allowing them to remain in until the cider is drawn. This is not only a lazy but slovenly practice, and should be carefully avoided.

THE MALAYS.—We learn from the Salem Register, that the Neptune, from Padang, brings the following report:—The barque Matilda, of Batavia, belonging to Fitz William Payne, Esq. arrived at Padang 2d May, from Troumond, Sumatra, where she had been for a cargo of pepper, but was compelled to leave the coast, and was returning to Batavia with only seven piculs of pepper, on account of the piratical proves of the Malays. She was attacked by one of them, and after an action of half an hour succeeded in beating her off. The Matilda was well manned, and had 8 guns; she received several shot in her hull, and considerable other damage. Many of the natives were killed—they showed much skill and tact, and fought desperately. The next morning the fleet consisting of 13 prows, bore down to renew the attack, which compelled her to leave the coast.—The attack on vessels is urged on by the Rajah Boojah, who is attempting to wrest the government from the reigning king. $1 per picul is exacted by him on the pepper taken from the coast, and all who do not comply with these terms are attacked.

There were living in the United States, according to the Census of June, 1830, 2079 persons, more than 100 years of age.
