Postal union official rejects vote on strike end

OTTAWA (UPI) — Joe Davidso, president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, Thursday rejected for the second time a government suggestion that the workers decide whether to end the 3-day strike.

Davidson had first rejected the proposal by Postmaster General Bruce McArthur last Monday, when he left the talks to resume a week ago.

Dear Mr. Trudeau:

I write to convey a message from my constituents at St. James, Prince Edward Island, who are concerned that the government's recent decision to reduce the number of postal workers in this community will have a negative impact on local businesses and services.

The government's decision to eliminate positions at the St. James post office has caused concern among residents, particularly small business owners who rely on the post office for a variety of services. The reduction in staff will likely result in longer wait times and decreased efficiency, which could deter customers from using the post office.

Moreover, the loss of these jobs will have a significant economic impact on the community. The reduction in staff will result in a decrease in the local workforce, which could lead to a decrease in spending and the local economy.

I urge the government to reconsider its decision and to explore alternative solutions that will ensure the continued availability of postal services while minimizing the impact on local businesses and jobs.

Sincerely,

[Your Name]
