TAKES MEAT TO TIGER CAT

Negro Caught Stealing Bacon Has an Explanation for the Judge.

Kansas City, Mo.—As head of a thriving household, Charles Webb, a negro, employed by the Fred Harvey Company, was a faithful provider. There was no question about it. Charles always "brought home the bacon." C. H. Edminks, special officer for the Harvey company, caught Webb taking some fifteen pounds of first-class bacon that he had stolen from the firm's commissary. According to the officer, Webb had cut the bacon into strips, which were concealed in various pockets of his clothes. In the South Municipal court Webb attempted to explain to Judge Edward J. Fleming why he had taken the bacon.

"Ah was jes takin' home a little meat foh mah cat, judge," explained Webb.

"Must have been a tiger," said the judge. "100. Suppose the poor cat will starve now."

A LIFE'S ROMANCE

By WALTER J. DELANEY

(Copyright, 1920, Western Newspaper Union)

It was no joyous elopement or ardent love adventure. Very rationally Arnold Brant and Eugenie Valle had met fifty miles from her home, had gone to an obscure clergyman, and been united in marriage. The new husband had just time to catch a train across the continent within the hour, and those two, so hurriedly bound in wedlock, as hurriedly parted.

"In two years, dear," he said, as he kissed her good-by.

"You wouldn't wait. You would have it so," she sighed. "I hope it is for the best."

"The knowledge that you are mine, all mine," returned Arnold Brant, "will inspire me to make a business success."

The train flashed away, the bride waved an adieu through a mist of tears. Before noon she was back at home, passing into the house of her brother Hartley, with whom she lived and no one was the wiser.

Hers had been a strange experience. Almost from her baby days she had been dominated by her brother's will. He had one thought in life—to make money. A cold, unsympathetic being, he chilled all the sweetness out of the life of Eugenie, and when she was seventeen forced her into marrying Peter Wynne.

The latter was a man with prospects, which Hartley magnified. The cheerless honeymoon lasted less than a month and then Wynne went to the far North to develop some mining property. If turned out a complete fiasco, and a year later word was received that Wynne was dead. Before that event Eugenie pined in solitude until, at a neighbor's home, she met Arnold Brant. There was no impulse of disloyalty to Wynne, but a deep, unspoken love existed between those two.

When the news came of the death of Wynne, both Brant and herself knew that the self-seeking Hartley, Valle would never sanction their union. Brant had the offer of a position in Australia. He induced Eugenie to consent to the secret marriage. And when they parted at the steps of the altar and possible years of parting faced them, Eugenie was supremely happy, for she had found love at last.

Only one letter Eugenie received from Brant, telling that he was about to start into the most remote part of the country and that if his purpose succeeded, he would return with sufficient means to win him the approbation and recognition of her mercenary brother.

Then to Eugenie came an appalling discovery. The full details of the illness and death of Wynne arrived. The first news had been premature. He was mortally ill, but survived for several months. Acting upon the initial intelligence, Eugenie had wedded Brant fifteen days before the demise of her first husband.

The later ceremony was illegal, and she was simply a widow and the man she cherished as her life's mate was no more than an utter stranger. She at once wrote to Brant, trusting to the letter finally reaching him however remote he might be from civilization.

A year went by and there was no indication that Brant had received the letter.

There was an old man named Mark Deavir who had been a power in the business world, but now a helpless invalid. Hartley had cultivated him in the hopes of utilizing his past prestige for his own benefit. One day he came to Eugenie astounding her with an offer of marriage from Deavir.

"It means independence for you," represented the subtle schemer, "for he will not live long."

Eugenie shrank from the proposal, but the artful and persistent Hartley
