Mrs. Morgenthau Grants Interview In Her Charming Home In Riverdale, N.Y.

BY KATHERINE HARRINGTON

The news story in the New York Times was brief and to the point. But it did not convey the personality of the woman who figures prominently in that news story, Mrs. Bessie Morgenthau. Her home in Riverdale is a model of charm, and it is easy to see why she is the kind of woman who is often described as "demure." She was brought up as a girl in the old-fashioned way, with a strict mother who was always there to see that she was properly brought up. She was taught to be modest and to respect the rights of others. When she was married, she was given a strict set of rules to follow, and she kept them. She was always respectful to her husband, and she never said a word that might be considered unkind. She was a model of good behavior, and she was always ready to help others.

"Mrs. Morgenthau has always been a model of good behavior. She was brought up as a girl in the old-fashioned way, with a strict mother who was always there to see that she was properly brought up. She was taught to be modest and to respect the rights of others. When she was married, she was given a strict set of rules to follow, and she kept them. She was always respectful to her husband, and she never said a word that might be considered unkind. She was a model of good behavior, and she was always ready to help others.

"When she was married, she was given a strict set of rules to follow, and she kept them. She was always respectful to her husband, and she never said a word that might be considered unkind. She was a model of good behavior, and she was always ready to help others.

"Mrs. Morgenthau has always been a model of good behavior. She was brought up as a girl in the old-fashioned way, with a strict mother who was always there to see that she was properly brought up. She was taught to be modest and to respect the rights of others. When she was married, she was given a strict set of rules to follow, and she kept them. She was always respectful to her husband, and she never said a word that might be considered unkind. She was a model of good behavior, and she was always ready to help others."