Czechoslovakia Faces Test Of Ability To Resist Intimination By The Soviets

By WILLIAM L. RYAN

Czechoslovakia is being pressed by the United States and the Western powers to maintain a nonaggressive foreign policy and to resist Soviet pressure. The United States has been encouraging the Czechs to continue their efforts to achieve economic and political independence. Some Czechs have expressed the hope that they might be able to achieve some degree of autonomy by the end of the year. However, the Czechs have been urged to be cautious in their actions, as there is a strong Soviet presence in the country. The Western powers have also been urging the Czechs to avoid any actions that might be seen as provocative.

While the Czechs have been making progress in their efforts to achieve economic and political independence, they have also been facing some setbacks. The Czechs have been trying to improve their relations with the West, but they have also been facing some difficulties in their efforts to improve their relations with the East. The Czechs have been trying to achieve a balance between their desire to improve their relations with the West and their desire to maintain their independence. However, they have also been facing some pressure from the East, as the Soviet Union has been urging the Czechs to maintain a nonaggressive foreign policy.
