As I Understand It—
You call that a budget?
by Claude Sprague

Faced with the dilemma of how many hours of work each employee should be assigned, the engineers in the engine department at the factory in the United States decided to conduct a survey to determine the number of hours each employee should work. This decision was made after considering the possible effects of the number of hours worked on the productivity of the employees.

In the same survey, the engineers also considered the effects of the number of hours worked on the employees' health and safety. They found that employees who work more than 8 hours a day have a higher incidence of accidents and illnesses. Therefore, they decided to set a maximum of 8 hours a day for all employees.

The survey also showed that employees who work more than 8 hours a day are less productive. The engineers concluded that this is because the employees are more tired and less focused when they work longer hours.

The survey results were shared with the employees, and they were asked to provide feedback on the decision. The employees were generally satisfied with the decision, and they appreciated the efforts made by the engineers to improve their working conditions.

Overall, the survey was a success in determining how many hours of work each employee should be assigned. The engineers were able to make an informed decision based on the survey results, and the employees were satisfied with the decision made.
