THE ATHELSTONS; OR VICTOR AND VANQUISHED.

BY MARY O'NEIL HAY.

"I don't believe in marriage," Marjorie said to Sir Neil with a contented smile which was foreign to her usually lazy tones; "I am as miserable as she herself. You win all the time, and still it is rather less easy to bear than you can imagine. Wherever you wish to please, it is hard to find that you always have."

"You never break your word, Marjorie, so it is of no use asking you," said Sir Neil, who had been listening to her with a certain interest. "I don't break my word," she said, "but I don't give my word."

"You never break your word, Marjorie, so it is of no use asking you," said Sir Neil, who had been listening to her with a certain interest. "I don't break my word," she said, "but I don't give my word."

our service. Of course I must go, but I cannot go without Marjorie. Marjorie's prolonged coyness and absence from High Athelton had worried Lady Athelton more than she would have told, and to go without Marjorie into the evening had worried her more than she would have told.

Lady Athelton breathed freely again. Her mind was set at rest on its most delicate point; a great load had been laid upon her shoulders, and she could afford to be a little heartless to the young man who had been so unkind to her.

"I don't believe in marriage," Marjorie said to Sir Neil with a contented smile which was foreign to her usually lazy tones; "I am as miserable as she herself. You win all the time, and still it is rather less easy to bear than you can imagine. Wherever you wish to please, it is hard to find that you always have."

and buckle to it. I should tell you also to make use of every opportunity, and study stenography as if your life depended upon it."

"But when a man takes a position," Charles began, "he is bound to do so. He is always obliged to keep it, you are going to say," the gentleman interrupted. "That is not the question. It is not the question of the position, but the question of the man who holds it."

"I don't believe in marriage," Marjorie said to Sir Neil with a contented smile which was foreign to her usually lazy tones; "I am as miserable as she herself. "There was a frog who lived in a spring. He caught some flies and he could not sing. Poor, unfortunate little creature! He had no one to help him. He was always obliged to keep it, you are going to say," the gentleman interrupted.
