STALIN IN COMMAND OF RUSSIAN ARMIES

MOSCOW, July 21.—Premier Stalin is said to have assumed personal command of the Red Army high command as a result of the recent death of Major Gen. Konstantin Rokossovsky, chief of staff for the Red Army. This was revealed by an announcement made on Wednesday by Premier Stalin. The announcement stated that Stalin had assumed command of the Red Army high command, effective immediately.

The announcement was made during a meeting of the Soviet government, which was attended by Stalin, who is reported to have spoken in an emotional and passionate manner. The meeting was held to discuss the situation in the European theater, where the Red Army is engaged in a series of offensive operations.

The announcement was greeted with great enthusiasm by the Soviet people, who have come to expect great things from Stalin's leadership. The Red Army has been fighting for more than a year, and it is said that Stalin's personal command will give it a new impetus.

The announcement was also welcomed by the Western powers, who have been speculating about the future of the Red Army. The announcement has been interpreted as a sign that Stalin is determined to continue the fight against Germany, and it is expected that this will have a marked effect on the course of the war.

The announcement was received with a degree of skepticism by some government officials, who believe that Stalin's personal command may not be as effective as it seems. They point out that the Red Army has been fighting for a long time, and that it is not just a question of the personal leadership of Stalin.

The announcement was also greeted with a degree of concern by some government officials, who believe that Stalin's personal command may have a negative effect on the war. They point out that Stalin has been known to act impulsively, and that his personal command may lead to mistakes that could harm the war effort.

The announcement was also greeted with a degree of enthusiasm by some government officials, who believe that Stalin's personal command will give the Red Army a new sense of purpose and direction. They point out that Stalin has been known to be a great leader, and that his personal command will give the Red Army a new sense of confidence.

The announcement was also greeted with a degree of concern by some government officials, who believe that Stalin's personal command may lead to a new sense of complacency. They point out that the Red Army has been fighting for a long time, and that it is not just a question of the personal leadership of Stalin.
