SEAT OF ANCIENT CULTURE

A thousand years before Columbus was to come, when Rome was in ruins and the shadow of the Dark Ages was beginning to fall over Europe, a sculptor, swarthy of skin and delicate of feature, was at work on a massive statue which was to give final touch and dignity to a temple set high in the mountains of a region to be known in far-off centuries as Central America.

sand years before Christianity, of strong and enlightened peoples who knew mathematics and astronomy, the melting and fashioning of gold and silver, the arts of husbandry; who lived their lives in accordance with a remarkable religion; who were skilled in certain arts and sciences, and who spoke tongues highly developed and rich in color.

Lying at altitudes 4,000 to 11,000 feet above the sea, Maya rulers chose this land as seat of empire, as centuries later it was to attract colonial overlords who made it site of Spanish power in Central America.

The people of Guatemala are among the most colorful of the Americas. Lineal descendants of the Mayas, they have preserved many of the rites and customs of their ancestors. Maya religion has given way to priest and church, but their fiestas, dances, music, retain the flavor of other years.

Guatemala has its rightful place of distinction in the practical world of trade. The coffee it produces is unexcelled in quality anywhere in the world, and leads the nation's exports.

Other increasingly important items on the republic's export list are bananas, sugar, cacao, chicle, rubber, cattle, hides, skins and woods, cabinet and dye woods especially.

Yet, with all of this; with all the wealth in minerals; with all the present and potential fruitfulness of lowlands, lofty valleys and timbered mountain fastnesses, the greatest and most satisfying of all Guatemalan treasure, in the appraisal of those who put value on things of the spirit, is the rich tradition of a culture of ages gone which finds expression still in the daily life of the people of this modern New World republic.
